So You Want To Be An O.R. Nurse?

The Interns’ Guide to Survival

in the Operating Room

by Krystal Atkinson, RN
Copyright © 2009 by Krystal Atkinson

All rights reserved. This book, or parts thereof, may not be reproduced in any form without expressed written permission.

Printed in the United States of America

Contact the author by email at: perioperativeoptions@verizon.net.

Table of Contents

I. Acknowledgements

II. Dedication

III. Introduction

1. The Interview Process
2. Day One
3. Scrubbing
4. Circulating
5. Rotations
6. Dazed & Confused...You’re not the pro anymore
7. Whatever You’ve Done, It’s Already Been Done
8. Tools for Success
9. Hitting the Brick Wall
10. You Either Love It or You Don’t
11. Who is My Preceptor Anyway?
12. Falling Down & Getting Back Up
13. Gaining Momentum
14. Taking Call
15. Putting in All Together
16. Being Part of the Team

Conclusion
Acknowledgements: At the final writing of this book, I am currently the Senior Leader of Surgical Services. I have left my O.R. home of 18 years to pursue the opportunity to open a new facility 45 minutes from my home. Prior to this move, I was at one of our facilities where I took the position as Director of Surgical Services. I moved from the O.R. where I ‘grew up’ to a sister campus. I will always be thankful to my friend Valerie Otey who saw the leadership abilities in me and recommended me for this position as she had been promoted to a position in our corporate office also leaving me with the best confidant, support and friend in Gennette Little. Although some things have changed, I would like to make my acknowledgements start from the inception of the idea of this work.

I would like to thank and acknowledge the following people: First giving honor to God for the ability to formulate words in a fashion that is understandable to the readers. My husband Rick, my very best friend and support system. Your support has gotten me where I am today and I love you dearly. My children Ashley, Brenden and Billy, who remind me everyday that you can do anything that you, set your mind to doing. To my parents, the late Clarence and Glenda Taylor thank you for always encouraging and affording me the opportunity to try anything my heart desired. I’m sorry that Daddy was never able to see this in print. To my sister, Kendell, who has always loved and supported her big sister. My grandmother Roberta Taylor, who always told me that I could do anything. To my aunt, Dr. Jean Turner who was my role model and inspiration for going into nursing and making learning a life-long process.

To Dr. Dimitri Bradley who taught me ‘Kingdom Principles’ and helped me to realize the entrepreneurial spirit within me. My Pastors: Bishop Leon and Pastor Maria Benjamin who have not only fed us spiritually, but have been very good friends to us. To Dwayne Clemmons for all of the encouragement as well as direction which you provided in getting this book published. To my O.R. Family: Faye Hughes my teacher when I came to the O.R., thanks for all of the knowledge that you have sewn into me, your strict adherence to the standards and getting me involved into AORN. To Deb Owen, my Director, thank you for giving me the opportunity to teach passing on knowledge to those who came after me. To Dr. William Kelley Jr., Linda Gabor and Connie Grove, my O.R. “parents,” I thank you for teaching me everything that you know, pushing me beyond my comfort zone to challenge myself and making me the O.R. nurse that I am today. To Linda Gabor, Chrissy Chappell, Jess Niccoli, Nancy Potter and Carrie Prezioso thanks for being role models as your talents made first assisting look so easy providing me a model to follow and helping me along the way as I learned this role always giving helpful words of advice making the journey easier. To all of my preceptors along the way and the preceptors who have helped mentor my interns who have blossomed into excellent O.R. nurses. To Betty Simmons who always had an encouraging word just when I needed it most. To Nancy Potter who masters in comic relief and has a heart of gold! To the Service Coordinators who tirelessly enlighten the interns and the rest of us on your services—I thank you. To the Clinical Coordinators, Holding Area Nurses and the rest of the O.R. staff, thank you for your contributions and patience as new interns came through the O.R. No matter how big or how small your contribution, it was greatly appreciated. To Bev Sill, thanks for making their journey to your area interesting, entertaining and less threatening than it had to be. To my professional organization: the Association of periOperative Registered Nurses (AORN) for setting the standard of professionalism for perioperative nursing—I’m proud to be a member.

Finally, I thank every intern that I have ever had the privilege to teach, for you gave me the inspiration for this book, renewed my excitement in teaching something that I love with each and every class and without your experiences, this book would not exist. The names of the interns have been changed to protect their identity.

Note: Names used in this book have been changed for staff members as well as physicians for protection of their identities.